People urged to wear masks and maintain social distancing even after taking Covid-19 vaccine

People who had contact with someone who has tested positive for Covid-19 should delay taking the second dose of the vaccine by 14 days from the date of contact, a senior Ministry of Public Health (MOPH) official said.

This was highlighted through an advisory issued by the Ministry of Public Health (MOPH) on February 6. The advisory added, “You will be highly protected from Covid-19 infection after two weeks from taking the second dose of the vaccine in an accompanying video. If an infected person is referred to as ‘infected’ by a health official, you will be given an appointment for the second dose. It is very important to take the second dose 14 days from the date of exposure, and if 14 days have passed, you may not be vaccinated.”

With vaccination against the COVID-19 pandemic slowly gathering momentum, one of the key questions the world is still debating is how long the protection offered by the vaccines will last. A new study by Public Health England (PHE) brings in a new dimension. The finding is that people who have had COVID-19 and have been reinfected are highly unlikely to develop severe infections. But there is still a risk you could acquire an infection and transmit (it) to others, she explained.

The SIREN research study regularly tested almost 20,000 health workers from across the UK between June and November 2020. Among them, 6,614 people had tested positive and 6,238 people said they had had COVID-19. The yet-to-be peer-reviewed study found that people who had COVID-19 had little chance of getting a COVID-19 vaccine. With the antibody test or the viral test, the efficacy of the vaccine is the first line of defense against infection. If we get sick, we don't know what to do. Would a hospital take us in? And what if the patient is a COVID-19 patient? It's the first line of defense, as the SIREN study has shown.

"We've heard about a vaccine coming but I don't think about that. I need to feed my children," the 13-year-old said.

The SIREN study has major implications for how we can get out of the current crisis. The good news is that the SIREN study has shown that the SIREN study has little chance of getting a COVID-19 vaccine. "The finding is that people who have had COVID-19 and have been reinfected are highly unlikely to develop severe infections. But there is still a risk you could acquire an infection and transmit (it) to others, she explained.

"We now know that most of those who have had the virus, and developed antibodies, are protected from reinfection, but this is not total and we do not yet know how long protection lasts," said Tuomas Makela, senior medical adviser at PHE and co-leader of the study, said in a statement. "Even if you believe you already had the disease and are protected, you can be highly unlikely you will develop severe infections. Scottish leader vows to hold ‘legal’ independence vote

More than 26,000 coronavirus cases have been recorded in Scotland since the pandemic began, but forecasts suggest the number will rise sharply in the coming weeks.

The Scottish government has been criticized for its response to the crisis and for its handling of the pandemic, which has led to a tightening of lockdown restrictions.

The Scottish government has said it will hold a referendum on independence in May, but opponents claim the vote is illegal.

The vote is expected to take place on May 10, with a turnout of around 40%.

A spokesman for the Scottish government said: "We have a right to a vote on independence, and we will hold one in 2021.

"The vote is a democratic right, and we will not be denied it by any court or any individual.

"We will hold the vote on May 10 and the result will be binding.

"We will not be denied the vote by any court or any individual."
With its focus on Qatari heritage and legacy along with modern-day life, the Sea Shore Art at Al Khor Carnival gives artists an opportunity to showcase their talent. The carnival has a space specially dedicated for graffiti, featuring the resilient face of art in Qatar. “We are here to showcase how artists in Qatar work. The graffiti is an attempt to highlight our presence,” said Saeeda Habeeb, who depicts women’s life in Qatar – past and present.

A member of the Qatar Fine Arts Association under Katara – the Cultural Village, Habeeb is active in various initiatives aimed at raising awareness and adding beautiful elements to public places. The artist is also part of Qatar Museums’ public art initiatives, the Jedariart programme.

Mustafa Ameen, another artist at the carnival, said that the exhibition has given him an opportunity to highlight his artistic talent while helping visitors get an insight about the traditions of Qatar. Artist Hassab Behoo’s work at the carnival features Qatari traditions and football.
