Australia's Covid-19 Delta outbreak worsens despite Sydney lockdown

Reutters

The prospects of an extended lockdown in Sydney continued on Monday, with authorities still weighing another record daily rise in Covid-19 cases for the past week, fuelled by the highly infectious Delta strain.

New South Wales state reported 32 new locally transmitted cases on Monday and confirmed that most of them in Sydney, despite defective lockdown measures, authorities said. Case numbers have been at record levels for at least three days. There was, however, a glimmer of light as the number of newly-Infected people who were out in the community while infectious dropped to 375 from 404 on Sunday, authorities said. The result of that figure is due to coming down, authorities said whether Sydney’s lockdown, due to end on Friday, would be extended.

One major number we used to get was the number of infected people out in the community while infectious, a number that was 404 on Sunday and 375 on Monday, a number that would have been worse if we didn’t have the health expert advised. With the number of those people who are in isolation is not the only number that matters, authorities said. There are about 33 people who have been identified as close contacts of the new cases,

Pfizer/BioNTech bid for booster doses may be premature

Pfizer Inc’s push for health regulators to authorize a third dose of its Covid-19 shot is not yet backed by evidence, despite the fast-spreading Delta variant, vaccine experts said.

Pfizer and German partner BioNTech Ltd said last week that they will use US and European regulators within weeks to authorize a booster dose due to the imminent risk of Delta variants.

The companies did not share the data showing that risk, nor did it reach review panels publicly. A handful of local health officials to discuss the matter was scheduled for yesterday, Pfizer said.

In interviews with Reuters, some leaders who are experts questioned Pfizer’s rationale and said more data was needed to justify a booster, especially as many countries struggle to administer the initial vaccine doses needed to protect their citizens.

“On paper, you have a complicated decision they took with such a bundled approach,” said Dr Larry Coker, a virologist at Australia’s Burwood Hospital Cancer Center who was one of US government-funded Covid-vaccine trials.

The rise of the Delta variant, first detected in India and now the dominant form of new coronavirus infections in many countries, has raised concerns over whether currently available vaccines offer enough protection. Several experts say a booster shot would be warranted if the dominant form of new coronavirus infections in many countries, has raised concerns over whether currently available vaccines offer enough protection. That has not been the case as far as the United States, where the overwhelming majority of seniors occur in unvaccinated people, he said. Shortly after Pfizer’s announcement last month, US health officials sought to reassure the public that anyone who already received 2 doses of the Pfizer’s vaccine was protected against Delta and death, even from the Delta variant.

“Americans who have been vaccinated have protection and are better off, this is a booster shot at this time,” the FDA and Center for Disease Control and Prevention said.

A Pfizer spokesperson declined to comment on the criticisms.

Pfizer Chief Executive Albert Bourla and other officials have said for months that they expect a regular booster shot will be needed against Covid-19, a prospect that could help company profits for years to come.

In explaining the decision to seek emergency authorization now, Pfizer cited findings released last week by Israel’s Health Ministry suggesting that the vaccine was only 64% effective at preventing transmission and mild disease and 91% effective at preventing severe disease and death.

According to the data, the vaccine was 91% effective in preventing severe disease and death.
